A method for the determination of (γ prime, sub p) is proposed which involves the separated oscillatory field magnetic resonance technique with flowing water. An association between the volume integral of a magnetic field in a cylinder (determined by a resonance frequency) and the line integral along its axis (determined by Ampere's law) is made. An accuracy of a few parts in $(10 \text{ to } 8 \text{th power})$ may be attainable with this technique.

The Newtonian gravitational constant G is one of the natural constants, the exact knowledge of which might give us important answers to cosmological questions and contribute to the support of a theory of gravitation. In a survey, the problems are set forth which are related to the gravitational constant, appertaining measurements are described, and the uncertainties of measurements obtained so far are compiled.

Redetermination of the Newtonian Gravitational Constant ' G ',

Included in Precision Measurement and Fundamental Constants II, p573-576 1984.

Keywords: *Fundamental constants, Experimental data, Measurement, *Gravitational constant, Uncertainty.

The universal Newtonian gravitational constant, G , has been redetermined at the National Bureau of Standards using the time-of-swing method, in which the period of a torsion pendulum in the form of a dumbbell weighing approximately 5 g is modified by the presence of two 10.5 kg tungsten balls. The difference in the squared frequencies with and without the balls is proportional to G . In this experiment the difference was approximately 3%. The apparatus used, albeit with extensive modification, is the same as used in the previous redetermination done at the National Bureau of Standards, using the method of constant angular acceleration. The apparatus is described, improvements are discussed, data is presented and evaluated. The resulting value of G is in agreement with the generally accepted CODATA value but with significantly smaller uncertainty.

Design of a Beam Balance for a Determination of ' G ',
C. C. Speake, and A. J. F. Metherell. 1984, 3p
Included in Precision Measurement and Fundamental Constants II, p577-579 1984.

Keywords: *Fundamental constants, Precision, Measurement, Design, *Gravitational constant, Balances, Beam balances.

The authors are currently engaged in the design and construction of a beam balance which will be used for a precision determination of G . The balance is designed to give a value of G to about one part in 100,000. In place of a knife edges the balance employs a cross-strip pivot for its fulcrum and flexure pivots are used to suspend the test masses from the ends of its arms. The balance is servo-controlled so that it maintains its position in the horizontal plane to an angle of about $10 \text{ to } 9 \text{th power rad}$. The attracting masses are in the form of rectangular slabs with rectangular holes at their centers. This shape ensures that the test masses suspended from the arms of the balance lie in regions of space where the gravitational field due to the slabs is highly uniform. A precise knowledge of the center-of-mass to center-of-mass distances is therefore unnecessary for a precision determination of G with this device.

Optimizing the Shape of the Attracting Mass in Precision Measurements of 'G',

It is now recognized that the sphere is not necessarily the best shape to use for an attracting mass in a precision measurement of G . Two shapes which minimize the effect of errors in the center-of-mass to center-of-mass distance between the attracting mass and the test mass are (a) the right-circular hollow cylinder and (b) a pair of rectangular parallelepiped slabs with rectangular holes at their centers. The kinematic factors influencing the design of these mass distributions are considered and the optimum design parameters that should be employed with attracting masses of these shapes are determined.

Vacuum Polarization and Recent Measurements of the Gravitational Constant as a Function of Mass Separation,

Included in Precision Measurement and Fundamental Constants II, p587-589 1984.

Keywords: *Fundamental constants, Measurement, Mass, Separation, Failure, Correction, *Gravitational constant, *Vacuum polarization, Inverse square laws.

The author notes that the coulomb inverse square law has long been known to fail at small charge separations due to a vacuum polarization effect. He points out that gravitational inverse square law data should be analyzed for a vacuum polarization effect and presents the QED result for the mass density shift of the vacuum due to an inducing mass. He points out that care must be used in analyzing the data because the point mass situation is very different from the case where one of the masses is quite extensive. He analyzes the current data for the value of the vacuum polarization parameter λ . Much of that data has errors too large to give definite results although it tends to agree with the authors earlier result of $\lambda = 0.002$. Of the more precise results, Stacey and Tuck are in agreement with the authors value while Spero et al. disagree. It is pointed out that the vacuum polarization analysis of the Spero et al. result is ambiguous.

The authors describe experiments at U.C. Irvine to test the inverse square distance dependence of the gravitational force at laboratory distances. One experiment has tested a distance range of approximately 2 to 5 cm, using a test mass suspended from a torsion balance to prove the gravitational field inside a mass tube. Results of this experiment support an inverse square law. A second experiment, now in progress, tests a distance range from 5 cm to 20 m. We discuss the feasibility of an experiment to test the inverse square law at distances less than 1 mm. Methods are discussed for reducing the effect of seismic noise on a torsion balance by damping pendulum oscillation modes of the balance.

Six independent geophysical data sets have been used to estimate the value of the Newtonian gravitational constant G , yielding results that are consistently higher than the accepted laboratory-determined value G by 0.5% to 1.5%. Possibilities of unrecognized systematic errors preclude a definite conclusion, so that new large scale measurements of G are needed to clarify the matter. Two such experiments, using masses distributed on quite different scales, both much larger than any laboratory measurement of G , are under development. One determines the gravitational attraction by a 3.5 km layer of sea water by measurements of gravity in a bathyscaphe. The other makes use of frequent level changes of a hydroelectric pumped-storage lake, involving a 10 m layer of water.

The Poisson equation of Newtonian gravitational potential provides a source-independent null test of the Inverse Square Law. A convenient Laplacian detector consists of superconducting gravity gradiometers in three orthogonal directions. Matching and stability of the cryogenic detector are achieved by utilizing superconducting circuits. Since the Laplacian of the gravitational potential produced by an arbitrary source is zero outside the source in the Inverse Square Law, this experiment becomes a source-independent null test for the constancy of the gravitational constant. This characteristic allows a precision test of the Inverse Square Law at geological distances using natural objects like an ocean or the earth. The authors discuss experimental procedures and expected sensitivities of the null experiment for three different sources: a swinging pendulum, an ocean tide, and the earth itself. It appears that the empirical limits in the Inverse Square Law could be improved by three to six orders of magnitude in the range between 1 m and 10 to the 7th power km by this new null experiment.

The weak but all pervasive force of gravity governs the overall behavior of the universe. The dramatic discoveries in astrophysics place gravitation in the forefront of interest and raise questions about the range of validity of Einstein's General Theory of Relativity and at what level it may prove to be a classical limit to a quantum theory. At present, after more than seventy years, the General Theory continues to be the most acceptable description of space-time despite continuing tests to challenge it by searching for contradictions to predictions based on this theory. The chief purpose of this paper is to review the results of recent tests and assess the status of experimental gravitation. The status is applicable present technology and developments for future measurements will be discussed.

Forty-four years after Dirac's original conjecture, experiments have become accurate enough to test for a time variation of the Universal Gravitational Constant. Present results use the lunar orbit, and do give a non-zero result. Interpreting the observed quantities with the Canuto-Hsieh scalar covariant cosmology, $(\dot{G}/G) = (-6.4 \pm 0.2) \times 10^{-11} \text{ per year}$. The implications for relativity and cosmology are briefly discussed.

The classical rotor for gravitational studies, the earth, has a varying decay time of about 3×10 to the 9th power years and a rotational roughness about 3×10 to the -8th power per day. A more rigid, highly protected, laboratory rotor might be made more suitable for gravitational measurements such as tests for the temporal variation of Newton's G and for cosmological matter creation. In this paper past tests for variation of G with other parameters are reviewed and the first room-temperature tests of precision rotors for such 'laboratory cosmology' experiments are discussed. The design of two such experiments at Virginia and the early results are presented for one protected rotor aimed at ultimately testing for matter creation at rates below (m dot)/m approx. = 10 to the -10 power/year.

Dirac's large numbers hypothesis (LNH) and its implications are reviewed. Recent work shows that if the LNH is correct then not only does the Newtonian gravitational constant decrease on an atomic time scale (G proportional to $1/t$), as inferred by Dirac, but the electrical force between two charged particles becomes stronger relative to their mutual gravitational force regardless of which of Dirac's two space-time scales, atomic or gravitational, is used. This is made explicit by introducing a Coulomb constant gamma analogous to G. The derivation of the two metrics directly from the LNH is demonstrated. Some observational implications of the LNH are listed.

The authors use a general framework--the chi-g framework--to study the empirical foundations of the Einstein Equivalence Principle (EEP), and to analyze the theoretical significance of various precision experiments and observations such as timing observations of pulsar signal propagation through galactic gravitational field, the Hughes-Drever experiments, the Eotvos-Dicke-Braginsky experiments, and the Vessot-Levine experiment. These experiments constrain various linear combinations of the components of chi to be metric to various degrees of accuracy, leaving only one component out of 21 not constrained. The theory with this component different from zero can be reformulated as a torsion theory. To test EEP and this theory, experiments on polarized test bodies are suggested.

Inertial Clock to Test the Non-Metricity of Gravity,

A certain class of non-metric gravitation theories implies that clocks of different electromagnetic nature will interact with local gravity differently and result in slightly different gravitational redshift measurements. As ideal rotating body would have its moment of inertia, hence timekeeping, depend on the rotor dimensions, so that it would act as an 'electrostatic clock.' In the past, precision high speed rotations of small spheres have exhibited long decay times, about 10 to the 10th power/s, and high Q. Simple extrapolation indicates that larger rotors should have much longer decay times. A double magnetic suspension of two rotors--an inner 'proof' rotor and an outer 'shroud' rotor--has been built and is under test as a method for reducing bearing and gas drags. This paper presents a description of a non-metricity test, analysis of the corotation scheme, and details of construction of the first, room-temperature inertial clock.

Relativistic frame dragging, i.e., the Schiff motional effect or the Lense-Thirring effect, has never been measured. Just two experiments proposed to date promise measurement accuracies of a few percent. The two are the gyro experiment and the twin satellite experiment. These two experiments, although very different, have a common element, a 'gyroscope' in a rotating gravity field. With the gyro experiment, a small cryogenic gyro is placed in orbit and its spin axis history is compared with a star to 0.001 arc sec/yr accuracy.

With the twin satellite experiment, two drag-free satellites are placed in reverse polar orbits and used as orbit-sized gyros. The sum of the nodal motion is checked to 30 cm against that predicted from earth oblateness using polar satellite-to-satellite Doppler data. This paper compares the errors and risks involved in carrying out each of these very demanding scientific space missions.

Keywords: *Special relativity, *Photons, *Fundamental constants, *Light speed, *Rest mass.

The special theory of relativity is shown to be independent of the assumption that the velocity of light, c, is a universal constant. No more than an intuitively obvious monotonicity postulate of velocity addition is needed to prove the existence of a universal, kinematic limit velocity ($c_{sub 0}$), and the existence of a universal dispersion relation for vacuum waves. The best empirical support for the signal postulate ($c_{sub 0} = c$) still comes from uncorroborated observations of the Crab Nebula pulsar which admit a photon rest frequency of up to 7 MHz, far above the limit inferred from the consistency of quantum electrodynamics (QED). Existing theory-dependent arguments purporting to demonstrate the constancy of c are shown to be inadequate. Further experimental work on the variability of c with frequency and with source conditions is desirable.

The atomic beam velocity will be determined optically via the Doppler shift. The longitudinal interaction geometry will also permit them to test with increased precision for a possible vector anisotropy in the speed of light, a possibility raising renewed interest because of recent astrophysical discoveries. Further, the authors expect to refine experimental values for the energies of the Rydberg terms in He.

In this experiment two rubidium vapor frequency standards were placed approximately 500 m apart and the phase of their signals compared as a function of time. The diurnal rotation of the earth was used to introduce a change in the direction of propagation of the signal, thereby providing a test of the assumption of isotropy of propagation of electromagnetic radiation. The relative phase difference between clocks was also compared for negligible separation of the clocks. The drift rate changed detectably for the separated clocks, while the round-trip velocity remained constant to within 0.0001% c. Typical variations observed in the one-way velocity imply a diurnal modulation of the order of + or - 0.1% to 1.0% c. The relative precision of the measurements amounted to 1 part in 5×10 to the 13th power.

Our possible confusion between the wave and particle pictures arising from the linearity of the de Broglie relation might be the cause of the divergence in field theories. When we assume that every line segment in three-dimensional space has a quantum structure analogous to the atomic chain of atomic distance $2(l \text{ sub } 0)$, the de Broglie relation is exponentially nonlinearized at sufficiently high momenta, and the symmetry between the two pictures is broken. It has been shown that, under such situations, the field theories automatically become finite without changing their conventional form. The present theory predicts that high-energy gamma-rays would be faster than visible light, though the detectability of the effect depends on the value of the unknown constant ($l \text{ sub } 0$).

The authors suggest the use of a Sagnac interferometer made of a fiber optic ring for detecting gravitational waves. Any distortion in the geometry of the ring on account of a gravitational wave is detectable as a phase shift between the counter propagating optical signals. In order to discriminate against angular velocity variations and any other local fluctuations, a pair of orthogonal coils is to be used and the system rotated about an axis lying symmetrically between the two coils. It is estimated that a stabilized He-Ne laser used as the source and fiber coils of 1 m diameter with 100 turns rotating with an angular velocity of about 1000 rad/sec will provide adequate sensitivity.

An investigation has been started of possible designs for a laser gravitational wave experiment with baseline lengths of roughly 1,000,000 km or longer. The objectives of the experiment are to search for narrow-band signals with periods of seconds to hours, for pulses of gravitational waves, and for broadband background radiation. One of the main goals is to detect signals from known rotating binary stars, such as Am CVn, WZ Sge, and i Boo. The corresponding gravitational wave periods are 8.76, 40.5, and 193 minutes. The expected strain amplitudes are roughly 0.4, 0.5, and 6×10 to the -21st power, respectively, which correspond to equivalent accelerations of 50, 4, and 2×10 to the -19th power g for a 1,000,000 km baseline. The main uncertainty in the expected signal strengths comes from the uncertainty in the distances. In view of the extremely tiny equivalent accelerations, care will be needed in designing the experiment in order to minimize spurious accelerations due to forces other than the gravitational attraction of the sun and planetary bodies.

Energy-Release Rate Associated with Diffusional Crack Growth.

Pub. in International Jnl. of Fracture 23, p229-242 1983.

Keywords: *Crack propagation, Diffusion, Fracture(Materials), Reaction kinetics, Thermodynamics, Energy, Reprints, J integrals.

A general expression for the energy release rate (G) that arise during steady state crack propagation by diffusion is derived from the standpoint of irreversible thermodynamics. Three contributing components of G are identified: (1) the Griffith energy (GGr); (2) heat generated in the process of surface diffusion; and (3) grain-boundary diffusion. Further, the total G is shown to be directly related to the well-known J-integral if the strain energy effects can be ignored. This expression for G is valid in general even if the response of the material is not linear and the mass transport kinetics does not follow Fick's law. Quantitative evaluations of each component are made for the linear case where field solutions are available.

Application of an Elastic-Plastic Model to the Use of Small Specimen Strength Ratio for Measuring Fracture Toughness.

Final rept.,
R. deWit, and C. G. Interrante. 1984, 8p
Pub. in. Jnl. of Engineering Fracture Mechanics 19, n6 p1151-1159 1984.

Keywords: *Fractures(Materials), Toughness, Fracture properties, Cracks, Stresses, Mechanical properties, Mathematical models, Reprints.

Data reported by Server and Wullaert correlating specimen strength ratio with fracture toughness were analyzed with the D-BSC-HSW model. This model is based on the Dugdale model, elaborated by Bilby, Cottrell and Swinden, and extended by Heald, Spink and Worthington. The data included instrumented pre-cracked Charpy results on HSST plate 02, as well as static, intermediate, and dynamic tests of 1 - T compact and bend specimens of SA533B-1 steel. The model relates the fracture toughness to the crack length, specimen shape and size, applied failure stress and effective flow strength. The only parameter not provided by the data is the constraint factor, M, the ratio of the effective flow strength to the yield strength. The model was fitted to the data by non-linear least squares methods by which M was determined to be approx. 2.5 for the Charpy data, and from 2.1 to 2.6 for the other specimen data. The fit is considered to be reasonably good throughout the range from linear-elastic fracture mechanics through to plastic collapse. The result for the Charpy data is considered to be as good as that for the other specimens. The determination of only one parameter is needed to establish the relationship between specimen strength ratio and fracture toughness. This relationship then applies to the entire range of fracture regimes.

An integral equation is derived for the strain field in a general infinite system subjected to arbitrary applied strains and stress-free transformation strains (eigenstrains) when the elastic constants of the material are a function of position. The approach is based upon establishing a reference frame free from strain but not necessarily free from stress. As an illustration, the technique is applied to the case of two misfitting coherent precipitates embedded in a matrix of uniform elastic constants.

Theory of Chemically Assisted Fracture.

Pub. in Proceedings of International Conference on Mechanical Behavior of Materials (3rd), Cambridge, England, August 20-24, 1979, p485-494 1980.

Keywords: *Brittle fracturing, Brittleness, Activation energy, Chemisorption, Reaction kinetics, Stress corrosion, Crack propagation, Theory, Fracture(Mechanics).

A general theoretical framework is developed for chemically assisted fracture in brittle materials. Using the theory of absolute reaction rates, an expression is developed for the subcritical growth of a brittle crack in contact with a reactive gas. The activation energy of the process is analyzed in qualitative terms. Although analytical results can be obtained for certain simplified models, the description presented here was in terms of general arguments that are expected to have wide validity. A distinction is drawn between quantities which have thermodynamic validity, and hence are related to the Griffith criterion for a stable crack, or the K sub ISCC of fracture mechanics, and those quantities which are kinetic in nature and are related to crack growth by thermal fluctuations. The theory is seen to rely heavily on earlier concepts developed for the lattice trapping of crack in brittle solids.

Finite Element and Experimental Evaluation of the J-Integral for Short Cracks.

Sponsored by David W. Taylor Naval Ship Research and Development Center, Annapolis, MD.

Keywords: *Cracks, *Finite element analysis, Evaluation, Reprints, *J integrals, Fracture toughness.

Fitness-for-service assessments of critical metal structures such as piping systems, pressure vessels, and ships require accurate predictive methods for fracture of parts containing small flaws or short cracks. Flaw size, geometry, applied loads, fabricator and material characteristics often combine to produce large scale plastic zones inappropriate for evaluation by linear elastic fracture mechanics. The J-integral is widely advocated as a suitable parameter to characterize both material fracture toughness and the driving force in elastic-plastic fracture. Procedures have been proposed to measure the material fracture toughness, J sub Ic, for standard test specimen geometries containing large crack lengths. However, there are no generally accepted methods to predict or experimentally measure the applied J-integral within a structural element containing a small crack (defined here by a crack length to remaining ligament ratio, a/W , < 0.25).

The title of the conference in its focus on atomistics certainly hints at the physical dimension, and it gives us our point of departure. However, before diving directly into a full-scale discussion of discrete lattices, I will first provide in the next section a very succinct background statement of the elastic description of a brittle crack. In the third section, discrete lattice theories are addressed directly, but first in one dimension for the purpose of emphasizing the kinds of phenomena for which an atomistic theory is important. This discussion points to the application of discrete lattice theories to the rates of atomic and chemical processes at the crack tip. In the fourth section we lay out the statistical mechanical framework for the thermal equilibrium of a crack and for thermally activated crack growth both for intrinsic lattices, and including interactions with external chemical environments. Then follows in section five a more detailed presentation and critique of the theoretical techniques for calculating the structure of lattices containing cracks in two and three dimensions. A short statement of the current status of the quantum theory of binding as it relates to defects will be included. Finally, in the sixth section, the question of stability of the crack in the lattice with respect to the emission of dislocations is discussed. A concluding short section summarizes the crucial points where future progress looks most promising.

A cooperative program with the Department of Energy, the National Bureau of Standards, and private industry is in progress to develop standard measurement practices for use in large scale applications of superconductivity. The goal is the adoption of voluntary standards for the critical parameters and other characterizations of practical superconductors. Progress for the period October 1980 through January 1982 is reported. The major effort was the development of a standard test method for critical current, the necessary back-up research, and the coordination of the adoption of the test method and a standard terminology through the subcommittee level in ASTM.

This annual report is the final one in a series which describes NBS research to develop procedures for the effective utilization of deep-level measurements to detect and characterize defects which reduce lifetime or contribute to leakage current in power-device-grade silicon. During this reporting period the previously written computer program for predicting excess-carrier lifetime was revised to calculate more accurately lifetimes for high or low injection conditions and in space-charge regions. Comparisons were made between lifetime measurements on platinum-doped silicon diodes and the predictions of the computer model. As part of the effort to extend the procedures to analyze data from nonexponential transient capacitance measurements, the time dependence of the capacitance-voltage relationship of a heavily platinum-doped silicon diode was measured as a function of bias voltage. Included as appendices are three recent publications resulting from the work. A listing of the lifetime-predicting computer program is also an appendix.

Thermoelectric Effect in a Weakly Disordered Inversion Layer Subject to a Quantizing Magnetic Field.

The authors demonstrate that the usual Kubo formula for thermal response functions is invalid if a magnetic field is present. There exists a fundamental correction due to lack of time reversal symmetry. In addition to being of general importance in the theory of transport, the authors show in particular that this leads to a novel thermoelectric effect in a weakly disordered two-dimensional electron gas subject to a strong magnetic field. The thermopower tensor is calculated within the self-consistent Born approximation using a generalized Mott formula which is derived.

The magnetic behavior of Y6Mn23 is dramatically altered upon hydrogenation (or deuteration). In this study, it has been found by means of high resolution powder diffraction and Rietveld refinement techniques, that the crystallographic structure is distorted from face-centered cubic (Fm3m) at 295K to a primitive tetragonal structure at 4K in which deuterium atoms are automatically ordered. Y6Mn23 is a ferromagnetic compound with T_c = 486K, and bulk magnetization of 13.2 (μ_B/f.u. (formula unit)). After deuteration of Y6Mn23 to the composition of Y6Mn23D23 low temperature scattering data (T < 175K) show that the b and (f sub 2) sites are antiferromagnetic and the d and (f sub 1) sites have no spontaneous magnetic moment.

Th6Mn23D16 and Th6Mn23D30 were studied by neutron diffraction profile refinement methods. At low temperatures, below 78 K, Th6Mn23D16 undergoes a crystallographic change from face centered cubic, Fm3m, to primitive tetragonal, P4/mmm. This compound has no long range magnetic ordering down to temperatures of 4 K. Th6Mn23D30 retains face centered cubic symmetry even at 4 K but exhibits ferromagnetism with a Curie temperature of 329 K. All moments are coupled parallel except the b site which has one Mn moment and is coupled antiparallel to the other 22 Mn moments in the d, (f sub 1) and (f sub 2) sites. The Mn magnetic moments are much less than those of Y6Mn23.

The authors study the two-dimensional electron gas in a quantizing magnetic field for the cases of Coulomb and harmonic interactions among the electrons. Numerical solutions for the quantum states of clusters of up to five electrons show that the strength of the excitation gap is a strongly oscillating function of the density not unlike what is observed in the anomalous quantum Hall effect. The authors present analytic results for the case of harmonic interactions and show that the variational wave function recently proposed by Laughlin for the Coulomb problem is in fact an exact eigenstate of the harmonic problem.

Neutron diffraction studies of the Y6(Fe(1-x)Mn(x))23 system reveal the presence of substantial preferential atomic ordering of Fe and Mn atoms on the four transition metal crystallographic sites. Throughout the entire compositional range, Mn atoms prefer to occupy the (f sub 2) site and Fe atoms the (f sub 1) site. Neutron diffraction profile refinements show no long range magnetic ordering occurring in the compositional range from $x = 0.35$ to 0.75 . The average Fe moments on each of the sites are reduced in the Fe-rich ternaries and remain ferromagnetically coupled. The manganese atoms are nonmagnetic.

The thermal conductivity of single crystal (KBr) $(1-x)$ (KCN) x , $0.05 \leq x \leq 0.5$, in the temperature range $0.08 - 100$ K shows behavior characteristic of amorphous solids. Furthermore, for $x = 0.25$, an abrupt change in the conductivity is seen in the vicinity of 70 K. The low temperature specific heats ($T < 2.5$ K), measured on long (about 50s) and on short (about ≤ 0.2 ms) time scales also are identical to those found in amorphous solids. The authors propose that the KBr-KCN system provides a connecting link between the low energy excitations in amorphous solids and in spin glasses.

Dynamic nonlinear behavior is reported at high currents in the Quantum Hall regime of GaAs heterostructures, resulting from breakdown of the dissipationless current flow. It is demonstrated that this breakdown is spatially localized and transient switching is observed on microsecond time scales among a set of distinct dissipative states. A simple macroscopic picture is proposed to account for these novel phenomena.

A magnetic phase transition ($T_M = 0.53$ K) to a long-period (about 100Å) magnetic state has been observed via neutron scattering in the superconductor ($T_{sub c} = 5.6$ K) HoMo₆Se₈. The characteristic wave vector ($q_{sub c}$) is strongly temperature dependent even though no higher-order satellites are observed. With use of a Ginzburg-Landau model it is found that the temperature dependence of ($q_{sub c}$) can be explained as due to a renormalization of the superconducting order parameter caused by the coupling to the local magnetization density.

Low-energy (20-500)-eV spin-polarized electrons were used to probe the magnetic surface properties of the ferromagnetic metallic glass Fe_(81.5)B_(14.5)Si₄. The spin-independent intensity and the spin-dependent asymmetry of the elastic scattering were measured as a function of applied magnetic field, electron energy, scattering angle, and angle of incidence. The scattering is liquidlike with no crystalline diffraction effects. Comparisons are made with scattering from the magnetic glass Fe₍₄₀₎Ni₍₄₀₎B₍₂₀₎ and an iron single crystal. Surface hysteresis curves as measured by the spin-dependent elastic scattering are very sensitive to ion-sputtering damage and to subsequent annealing. The asymmetry of the inelastic scattering was also measured for various primary energies and was found to closely resemble the elastic scattering asymmetry.

The built-in electric field for holes due to donor-density gradients in n-type silicon is calculated at 300 K for donor densities between 1×10^{10} to the 18th power and 1×10^{10} to the 20th power/cc. The calculation is based upon a recent model of band-gap narrowing that includes the effects of ionized impurities, many-body interactions, and an estimate of spatial fluctuations of the band-gap edge caused by the random distribution of donor atoms in the silicon crystal. This model of band-gap narrowing differs significantly from a number of other band-gap narrowing models currently in use in that it agrees with the band-gap narrowing measured optically at 35 and 300 K rather than that inferred from electrical measurements. The built-in electric field based on this model, which also differs significantly from the results of most previous models, decreases significantly above a donor density of 1×10^{10} to the 19th power/cc with a reversal of the field above 7×10^{10} to the 19th power/cc. The implications of this work for photodiodes are discussed.

This paper explores the uses of particle-hole symmetry in the study of the anomalous quantum Hall effect. A rigorous algorithm is presented for generating the particle-hole dual of any state. This is used to derive Laughlin's quasi-hole state from first principles and to show that this state is exact in the limit ν approaches 1, where ν is the Landau level filling. It is also rigorously demonstrated that the creation of m quasi-holes in Laughlin's state with $\nu = 1/m$ is precisely equivalent to creation of one true hole. The charge-conjugation procedure is also generalized to obtain an algorithm for the generation of a hierarchy of states of arbitrary rational filling factor.

The authors develop a general formulation of quantum mechanics within the lowest Landau level in two dimensions. Making use of Bargmann's Hilbert space of analytic functions, they obtain a simple algorithm for the projection of any quantum operator onto the subspace of the lowest Landau level. With this scheme, they obtain the Schrodinger equation in both real space and coherent state representations. A Gaussian interaction among the particles leads to a particularly simple form in which the eigenvalue condition reduces to a purely algebraic property of the polynomial wave function. Finally, the authors formulate path integration within the lowest Landau level using the coherent state representation. The techniques developed here should prove convenient for the study of the anomalous quantum Hall effect and other phenomena involving electron-electron interactions.

The dc current through an S(1)-S(2) tunnel junction, with $\delta(2)$ greater than $\delta(1)$, when biased with $eV < \delta(1) + \delta(2)$ will lower the energy in S(1).

This energy reduction will be shared by the phonons and electrons. This device is shown to be analogous to a thermoelectric refrigerator with an effective Peltier coefficient $\pi \approx \delta(1)/e$. Tunneling calculations yield the cooling power, the electrical power supplied by the bias supply, and the cooling efficiency.

After the Josephson effect, a second solid state quantum effect--the quantized Hall resistance--seems to be useful to determine fundamental constants. The authors will demonstrate that electrons at the interface between two semiconductors or at a semi-conductor-insulator interface may form at low temperatures a degenerate two-dimensional electron gas with discrete energy levels (Landau levels), if a strong magnetic field is applied perpendicular to the interface. Under experimental conditions where an integer number i of Landau levels is fully occupied with electrons, the value of the Hall resistance $R(H)$ (ratio between Hall voltage and current through the sample) becomes quantized with values which depend only on fundamental constants: $R(H) = h/(e^2 i)$ (h = Planck constant, e = elementary charge). The authors experiments on (100) silicon MOSFETs (Metal-Oxide-Semiconductor Field-Effect-Transistors) and GaAs-Al(x)Ga(1-x) As heterostructures show that the measured value of the quantized Hall resistance is independent of device parameters.

The quantized Hall conductivity has been measured in n-channel inversion layers of silicon metal-oxide-semiconductor field effect transistor devices at temperatures below 1.4 K using magnetic fields up to 15 T with improved accuracy and resolution. This work aimed to reexamine a new method for $h/(e \text{ squared})$ determination proposed by von Klitzing, Dorda, and Pepper. The result, which corresponds to $h/4(e \text{ squared})$, and its one standard deviation uncertainty are $-1/(\sigma \text{ sub } xy) = (6453.1969 \pm 0.0046) \Omega \text{ (ETL)}$ or $(6453.1969 \pm 0.0045) \Omega \text{ (ABS)}$. This result agrees with that obtained by other methods to 1 ppm.

The authors have observed quantization of the Hall resistance of the two-dimensional electron gas in GaAs-Al(x)Ga(1-x) As heterostructures. The quantized Hall resistance is given by $\rho_{xy} = h(2e \text{ squared})(N + 1/2)$ where N is the quantum number of the Landau level immediately below E(F). The authors results show that the quantized ρ_{xy} as given by this relation does not depend on temperature T, magnetic field B, and the electron mobility μ of the sample, which in this experiment is varied from $\mu = 1.8 \text{ (m squared)}/V.s$ to $6.9 \text{ (m squared)}/V.s$. In other words, B, T, and μ must suffice to reach the quantum regime, which is evidenced by the vanishing of the parallel resistance ρ_{xx} , but the value of quantized ρ_{xy} is independent of them. In the authors samples, this quantum regime is reached for $B \approx 3 \text{ T}$ at $T = 1.2 \text{ K}$ and for $B \approx 4 \text{ T}$ at $T = 4.2 \text{ K}$. This modestly low magnetic field requirement makes this system a practical primary resistance standard.

In experiments on two-dimensional conductors, steps proportional to $(e \text{ squared})/h$ have been observed in the quotient of the electric current and the Hall voltage. They can be explained on the basis of the well-established theory of the Shubnikov-De Haas effect, provided the dependence of the scattering lifetime on the density of states is consistently taken into account. Results of numerical calculations of the Hall voltage and of the electrical resistance agree closely with published experimental data.

This paper deals with a Monte Carlo calculation of a two-dimensional spin system on a triangular lattice. The interactions considered are: (1) Ferromagnetic nearest neighbor, (2) Antiferromagnetic nearest neighbor and (3) Antiferromagnetic nearest neighbor coupling with ferromagnetic next nearest neighbor coupling. The results of 1 and 2 are compared with the Onsager calculations of Houtappel and Wannier. The authors found minor discrepancies in both calculations. For the third model they found a new low temperature transition, not predicted by the Bethe-Peierls calculations. The new phase is displayed. The authors propose a modification of the Monte Carlo procedure, using the conditional probability and found faster convergence with this method. The results described above were obtained using either method.

An overview of the effect of strain on the critical current, critical field, and critical temperature of A15, B1, and C15 superconductors is presented. Reversible elastic strain effects in many A15 superconductors have been measured, analyzed, and compared in terms of simple strain scaling parameters. In addition, a new critical parameter -- critical strain (ϵ_c) -- is described and used to characterize the strain sensitivity of these materials. The elastic strain effect is shown to be strongly dependent on crystal structure; it is nonexistent in all superconductors with the B1 and C15 crystal structure tested thus far. Possible mechanisms for explaining the elastic strain effect are briefly described.

In this paper a new theory and experimental method are described for evaluation of surface residual stresses in inhomogeneous, anisotropic materials. The method is based on the use of horizontally polarized shear waves (SH-waves) that propagate at a grazing angle with respect to the surface of a sample. In addition, a new theory is presented for grazing SH-waves propagating through a body in which the stress distribution varies with depth. It is shown that, to first order, the average velocity of the grazing SH-waves is dependent only on the surface values of residual stress. Based on the use of electromagnetic-acoustic transducers (EMATs) to generate and detect grazing SH-waves, preliminary experimental verification of the theory is presented.

The optical orientation of electron spin in semiconductors provides the basis for the most intense and well controlled source of spin polarized electrons. The method of polarized electron production, the characteristics of the source, and possible ways to increase the polarization are reviewed. Polarized electron sources using optical orientation in GaAs have been applied to a variety of experiments in atomic, condensed matter, and particle physics and a few illustrative examples are presented. A 'perfect' polarized electron-atom scattering experiment is discussed in which the quantum amplitudes and phases which are spin dependent owing to the spin-orbit interaction are determined. Surface magnetism of ferromagnetic solids is investigated by polarized electron scattering, where the spin dependence is due to the exchange interaction; surface hysteresis curves, the deviations of the surface magnetization from the bulk at low temperatures, the critical exponent of the surface magnetization, and spin dependent electronic band structure can be determined. Finally in elementary particle physics, high energy deep inelastic scattering of polarized electrons has given evidence of parity violation attributable to weak neutral currents as predicted in the Weinberg-Salam unified gauge theory.

In previous work on a one-dimensional lattice model of a crack, the authors have shown how the discrete nature of bond rupture exhibits energy barriers to brittle crack propagation, and how these barriers resisting thermally activated crack propagation are related to idealized interatomic force laws for a material. The authors have now generalized results to two-dimensional, and to some extent three-dimensional crack configurations. In the paper they demonstrate this generalization, and draw a number of conclusions regarding how real cracks should behave. The authors also are able from their general results, to answer in the negative way an intriguing question, which has appeared at several points in the previous literature, as to whether force laws exist which allow the discrete atomistic barriers to subcritical crack propagation to vanish altogether. Finally, the authors discuss how their general formalism applies to chemically assisted bond rupture at the crack tip.

The critical Landau level filling factor (ν sub c) for the transition from Laughlin's liquid state to a Wigner crystal is determined by comparing the energies of these states. The Wigner crystal energy is substantially improved over the Hartree-Fock result by using a variational wave function which includes particle correlations. The liquid state energy is obtained from the Monte Carlo calculation of Levesque, et al. The authors found (ν sub c) to be slightly larger than $1/7$ which is consistent with the experimental observation by Mendez, et al. that the fractional quantum Hall effect does not occur for $\nu =$ or $< 1/7$. The improvement in the crystal energy by correlation is essential to this agreement since without correlations, (ν sub c) is about $1/10$. In addition, the crystal correlation energy explains the very low temperatures required to see the $\nu = 1/5$ liquid state.

The authors report high precision measurements of the temperature dependence of the quantum Hall resistance for two GaAs heterostructures. The Hall resistivity (ρ sub xy)(T) is found to vary linearly with the minimum resistivity along the device (ρ sub xx, sup min)(T) and to depend upon the sample, Hall probe set, and magnetic field direction, but to approach a sample-independent value as T approaches 0. The temperature dependent shift of (ρ sub xy)(T) from (ρ sub xy)(0) can be significant even for very flat Hall steps and is inconsistent with standard mechanisms.

Keywords: *Hall effect, *Electron phonon interactions, Electron gas, Magnetic fields, Reprints, *Quantum Hall effect, Two dimensional, Electrical conductivity.

The Quantum Hall Effect is manifested by plateaus in the Hall conductivity at which the current flows without loss. Recently it has been observed that as the current is increased to a critical value, corresponding to a carrier drift velocity of the order of the speed of sound, there is a dramatic onset of dissipation. The authors investigated the role in the breakdown of phonon-assisted transitions between Landau levels and calculated the steady-state power absorption. As the drift velocity of the carriers is increased there is a sudden onset of dissipation, and an upper limit for the critical current is obtained.

Measurements of temperature, velocity and irradiance, and observation of flame height were made in the near field of the turbulent diffusion flames from a porous burner with propane as fuel located in a large area simulating semi-infinite space, on a thermally thick wall and in a wall-corner. The data on the upward currents in the semi-infinite space were compared with an integral model of turbulent diffusion flames derived without assuming the entrainment hypothesis. The nature of diffusion flame as an external radiation source is also studied based on the model.

Keywords: *Hydrogen, *Thermal expansion, Liquefied gases, Cryogenics, *Liquid hydrogen, Temperature dependence, Pressure dependence.

The thermal expansion coefficient α of liquid normal hydrogen (n-H₂) was measured between 18.8 and 22.2 K in the pressure range 5 to 70 bar. The results are compared with those derived from PVT measurements by others on both normal and para (p-H₂) hydrogen.

Our analysis of the earlier normal data includes fitting an empirical equation of state, and expansion coefficients are derived from this equation by differentiation. We discuss the effects on α and the compressibility β from molecular quadrupole interactions; both theoretical and empirical results suggest these to be on the order of 2% or less for the normal spin mixture. We conclude that our thermal expansion data are consistent with earlier results on both n-H₂ and p-H₂ in this range of pressures and temperatures.

A new determination of the Stefan-Boltzmann constant is being made using a blackbody source of thermal radiation at 273.16 K and a detector in the form of a heat-flow calorimeter at 2 K. From a knowledge of the geometry of the aperture system and the thermodynamic temperature of the blackbody, the Stefan/Boltzmann constant may be deduced.

Keywords: *Thermal radiation, Blackbody radiation, Radiometers, Emissivity, *Stefan-Boltzmann constant.

Progress at NRLM on the radiometric measurement of the Stefan-Boltzmann constant is described. In the method, the total radiant flux emitted from a blackbody source that is spatially defined by two limiting apertures is measured by an absolute radiometer. A newly developed absolute radiometer is described that has improved uniform responsivity over the surface of the receiver; the variation of responsivity is less than 0.2% over an area 15 mm in diameter. Emissivities of blackbody cavities are calculated by the Monte Carlo method taking into account partial specular reflection of radiation on the cavity walls. An approach to a perfect blackbody cavity is also presented. It is discussed how uncertainties of blackbody source temperature and of diffraction losses of radiant flux are to be minimized.

Recent progress made toward the calculation of the ground states of liquid and solid helium from first principles suggests that a future pressure standard might be based on the calculated phase diagrams of (3)He and (4)He. The absolute reference pressures of the zero temperature intercepts and minima of the melting curves of these systems would be transferred to room temperature gages and provide a new connection between fundamental constants and density or mass. Already, present experiments suggest that the helium melting curves can provide pressure reference points which are precise within 1 ppm. A summary of the current state of theoretical work is given followed by a discussion of the practical difficulties in realizing the linkages between the melting curve and room temperature pressure, mass and density.

The agreement persists until the time for onset of convection which varies approximately as $1/(q \text{ squared})$ where q is the heat flux to the fluid.

The thermal radiation properties of materials are reflectance, absorptance, transmittance, and emittance. They are called thermal radiation properties because they control the rate of heat transfer by radiation between noncontacting bodies at different temperatures, and between a body and its surroundings. Radiant heat transfer is the only mode of heat transfer in a vacuum and becomes the dominant mode of heat transfer between noncontacting solids at high temperatures, such as exist in many industrial furnaces.

This paper is written as chapter 11 for the book Cryocoolers, by G. Walker. In this chapter the thermodynamic fundamentals applicable to any refrigeration system are discussed. Emphasis is placed on systems other than the gas-liquid systems normally used in mechanical refrigerators in hopes of stimulating new ideas in refrigeration. Because refrigeration power is proportional to the available entropy of the system, entropy comparisons are used to evaluate the potential of new systems. The systems discussed here include such things as electrons, phonons, magnetic dipoles, electric dipoles, mixtures, electrochemical cells, photons, as well as some gas-liquid-solid systems. A description of how each of these systems can be used for refrigeration, along with the useful temperature range, is presented.

Keywords: *Electromagnetic wave transmission, *Electromagnetic scattering, *Integral equations, *Dielectrics, Wave equations, Greens function, Monochromatic radiation, Reprints, Vector fields, Transients.

The determination of the scattered and transmitted transient electromagnetic waves produced by a uniform dielectric body is reduced to the solution of a singular integral equation of the first kind for one tangential vector field defined on the surface. All derivations are carried out within the heuristic approach to Green functions and delta functions. The electric and magnetic fields are expressed in terms of the sources, initial values, and the boundary values by means of the Green function for the scalar wave equation. The appropriate integral equation is derived, and the integrals for the scattered and transmitted fields are given. The simpler problem of scattering of scalar waves is developed first. Formulas for the scattering of monochromatic fields are also given in the scalar and electromagnetic cases when transmitted fields do not vanish.

Keywords: *Residential buildings, *Fire detection systems, Sprinkler systems, Fire alarm systems, Safety, Assessments, State of the art.

The report provides a qualitative assessment of the life safety impact of early warning fire detection and automatic sprinkler technology in residential occupancies. This assessment is based on the results of full scale studies and statistics on residential fire fatalities from the NFIRS data base. Estimates of the impact of three alternatives, smoke detectors, standard automatic sprinklers, and residential sprinklers, are provided for major fire hazard scenarios in residential occupancies. A quantitative approach is outlined that can lead to a more accurate assessment of the impact of detectors and sprinklers. An initial framework is presented which identifies the key parameters for residential life safety. A mathematical expression is proposed as a success criterion. Work is underway to extend the framework to sufficient detail to permit formulation of appropriate analytical expressions necessary for quantitative evaluation of specific parameters and their interrelationships.

A series of tests was conducted in five instrumented chimneys to study the intensity and duration of chimney fires due to the ignition and burning of combustible deposits accumulated on the chimney lining over a prolonged period of time. These tests were conducted (1) to establish typical conditions including temperatures in the chimneys and on combustible surfaces nearby, (2) to determine the duration of the burnout as evidenced by elevated temperatures within the chimneys, and (3) to compare these measured values with those obtained during overfire conditions - prolonged firing of the appliances at high rates. The results of these tests point out some areas where the codes and standards covering residential wood heating appliances should be modernized to better protect against failure due to chimney fires.

Fire Induced Flows Through Room Openings - Flow Coefficients,

Sponsored in part by Armstrong World Industries, Lancaster, PA.

Keywords: *Air flow, *Fire tests, *Flow distribution, *Orifice coefficients, *Room fires.

A full-scale experimental and theoretical study was made of steady-state fire-induced flows through doorway and window openings. Measurements included two-dimensional temperature and pressure-difference profiles within the opening and vertical temperature profiles within the rooms connected by the openings. A floor-level gas burner served as the energy source. Mass flow rates through the openings were calculated from the opening data. A static-pressure flow model was used to establish ideal orifice flows from different combinations of the experimental temperature profiles. The opening and ideal flow results were combined to form room-opening flow coefficients as a function of fire energy release rate, opening geometry, and fire location. Two calculation procedures were used to compute the ideal flow. An irrotational jet model for the flow coefficients was developed and found to be in reasonable agreement with these and other measurements. Measured flow coefficient results show no significant dependence on fire strength, opening geometry, or fire location, as long as the ideal mass flow rate was based on measured gas temperatures. However, the theory indicates a significant variation in flow coefficient with opening widths larger than those used in the experiments.

combustion of the fuel. The critical fuel load is small compared to that likely to be encountered in a real fire situation so the possibility of a flash fire under ventilation limited conditions must always be considered.

Keywords: *Pyrolysis, *Ignition, *Wood, *Fire tests, Surfaces, Thesis, Heat transfer, Mass transfer, Thermochemistry, Temperature, Physical properties, Chemical properties, *Fire spread, Mass fractions.

In this work, experimental techniques and methods were developed to study the growth of fire from a point ignition to a burning area of two feet in diameter. Numerous experiments on ten different kinds of wood were conducted to determine the dominant mechanisms of fire spread and to obtain reliable chemical and physical data. Simultaneous measurements of fire diameter, weight loss, surface temperature, forward flame radiation, total convective and radiative energy, depletion of O₂, production of CO₂, CO, total unburned hydrocarbons, and water were made. The study also developed a theory to predict transient fire growth on the basis of the following observations: (1) that fire spread may be treated as a continuous ignition process, (2) forward gas-phase heat transfer is a local phenomenon independent of fire size, (3) forward radiative heat transfer is the primary accelerating mechanism, (4) energetics due to desorption of adsorbed moisture is far more important than heat of thermal decomposition of wood, (5) reradiation from wood and char is the primary heat loss mechanism, (6) conduction of the heat parallel to the spread surface does not contribute significantly to the fire spread process.

Ignition sources common to cryogenic systems are enumerated and the experimental methods used to objectively determine compatibility of materials with liquid oxygen and liquid fluorine are classified and described. The relative compatibility of materials with fluorine and oxygen as revealed by various compatibility tests is discussed. Several guidelines are suggested for choosing materials compatible with liquid oxygen or liquid fluorine. A brief discussion of hydrogen embrittlement of metals and alloys as it pertains to liquid hydrogen service concludes the review.

In order to understand the response of a detector to a given fire in an enclosure, it is necessary to relate the local thermal and aerosol characteristics actually sensed by the detector to the physical and geometrical properties of the fire and the enclosure. This paper presents computations designed to predict the evolution of the size distribution of smoke aerosol as it ages, as well as the large-scale air movement and temperature fields generated by an enclosure fire. The computations contain three main ingredients: first, a finite difference solution for the air movement and temperature generated by a prescribed source of heat used to represent a fire in a closed room; second, the computer evaluation of an exact solution to the ageing equation corresponding to the evolution of an experimentally observed size distribution; and third, a particle tracking scheme which permits the smoke aerosol to be followed in space and time as it gradually fills the room. No nonphysical empirical parameters (e.g. turbulence models) are employed in these calculations. The mathematical and physical models are summarized briefly, but most emphasis is placed on displaying results. Sample calculations are presented, comparisons are made with relevant experiments, and predictions of the local environment experienced by a detector due to the occurrence of an enclosure fire are shown.

Forward and reverse smoldering combustion propagation, supported by forced air flow, have been studied in two types of permeable fuels, a cellulosic loose-fill insulation (wood fibers) and a particulated polymer foam (polyisocyanurate). Thermocouples and gas sampling (O₂, CO, CO₂) were used to probe the structure of the two types of smolder wave. There are marked qualitative and quantitative differences in the two smolder propagation modes. Reverse smolder quickly reaches a steady propagation rate determined largely by heat transfer processes; forward smolder propagation is unsteady and moves at a lower rate that appears limited by the stoichiometry of char oxidation. Both modes of propagation are ultimately limited by the rate of oxygen supply.

A general technique for calculating the time available for safe egress from a fire is presented. A definite model of hazard development is introduced, and the details of the technique are formulated for the room of fire origin problem. The inputs to the model are the area and ceiling height of the room, data from free burn tests of characteristic fuel assemblies likely to be found therein, the anticipated mode of fire detection and a criterion for hazard. The output is a definite estimate of the length of time between detection of a fire and the onset of hazardous conditions. Examples of applying the calculation technique are presented and discussed. In the course of developing these examples some universal working graphs are generated.

Pressurized stairwells have been used increasingly in the past few years to provide smoke free escape routes. However, generally accepted and proven design procedures for these systems are not available. This paper provides a discussion of several of the designs currently in use. In particular, single and multiple injection systems are discussed. The factors affecting the performance of pressurized stairwells are discussed. A method of analyzing pressurized stairwells is developed for a simple building model, and example calculations using this method are provided.

The use of ASTM D635 and associated criteria as an evaluation method for solar collector glazings was investigated. Four materials commonly used in solar collector applications were evaluated by ASTM D635. Four other test methods were used to characterize the glazing materials as to ignition, flame spread, and heat release rate. These results were compared to large scale fire tests of these materials. Based on the large scale tests, it was found that ASTM D635 produced test results that were not consistent with those obtained from the large scale tests. Good agreement was found between the rank ordering of the large scale tests and heat release rate and ignition properties as measured in the cone calorimeter and modified ISO test.

As an aid to understanding the ignition mechanism of liquid fuels under high intensity radiation, the time sequence of behavior of a liquid fuel and of the fuel vapor near the liquid surface was observed by high speed schlieren and direct photography. A CW CO₂ laser with fluxes up to 1000 W/sq cm was used with beam incident angles of 30 and 90 degrees with respect to the liquid surface. Both n-decane and 1-decene were used as the liquid fuel. The pictures reveal, in time sequence, the formation of a radial wave, a central surface depression, bubble nucleation/growth/bursting followed by complex surface motion and further bubbling. Effects of laser flux level, incident laser angle and absorption coefficient of the liquid (16/cm and 50/cm) on the formation of bubbles, the size of the bubbles, the frequency of bubble formation and the vaporization process were studied. A simple order of magnitude analysis is applied to ascertain the dominant process that underlies these phenomena.

Measurement of the Protective Value of Fabrics in a Fire Environment.

A method for measuring the protection provided by fabrics in a fire environment is described. Fabrics are subjected to a heat load, and the heat flux behind them is measured. The apparatus can be adjusted to simulate a variety of fire situations; the total incident heat flux can be varied, as well as the ratio of the radiative and convective components; the heat sensor can be in contact with the fabric, or at a distance simulating looseness of fit of various garments; resistance to ignition can be determined by exposing the heated specimen to a pilot flame; and the heat received by the fabric at which charring or melting occurs can be determined. Typical results on a variety of reasonably ignition resistant fabrics are shown and related to fabric construction parameters. The results are expressed in terms of time of exposure until an incipient second degree burn is likely to occur. This time to injury is estimated based on work of previous investigators. Optimum use of the method would involve study of the types of heat exposure to which workers in various industries, fire fighters, etc. are likely to be subjected and reproducing these conditions in the laboratory.

A study was conducted on climatological data for eleven cities located throughout the United States. Findings from this environmental study were used to develop conditioning cycles for a research project on the influence of environments on the fire performance of loose-fill cellulosic thermal insulation. Six cellulosic insulation materials containing 25 percent by weight of fire retardant chemical add-on of different compositions were specially manufactured for this study. These materials were tested to establish a baseline. After the materials were exposed to the various environmental cycles, they were tested for fire performance. Results from these tests show that environmental exposure can have a significant effect on the fire performance of cellulosic insulation materials and indicates that long term fire protection provided by fire retardant compounds may be limited.

Atomic ion mobilities have been directly determined in C₂H₂/air and CO/O₂ flames using optical excitation to instantaneously create a pencil of ions and then measuring ion velocities in an applied electric field. The ions were chosen to provide a wide range of atomic weights (Li, Na, K, Ca, Sr, Ba, Fe, In, Ti, U), thus providing a good comparison with the Langevin theory of ion mobility under several flame conditions. In all cases the Langevin theory provides an upper limit and predicts the measured mobility to within 50%, with best agreement obtained in general for the smaller and less polarizable ions.

Keywords: *Fabrics, *Flammability testing, Hazards, Comparison.

The flammability hazard of various apparel fabrics was examined on both the Apparel Fire Modeling Apparatus (AFMA) and the Mushroom Apparel Flammability Tester (MAFT). Potential hazard as measured on the AFMA generally decreased for the cellulosic fabrics under the following conditions: (1) contact with a copper surface, (2) surface (vs hole) ignition, and (3) addition of flame retardant (FR) chemicals. The untreated synthetics had lower potential hazard than most of the cellulose and appeared relatively unaffected by varying experimental conditions on the AFMA. On the Mushroom Apparel Flammability Tester most fabrics studied did not qualify for the safest class of fabrics according to the proposed apparel flammability standard. Ignition studies on the MAFT for further classification of the fabrics showed that classification for the cellulose could be improved by: (1) increasing fabric weight, (2) increasing level of FR treatment, and (3) blending with an inherently FR fiber, (modacrylic). Comparison of AFMA potential hazard measurements with MAFT values showed that four of the eighteen fabrics tested were less hazardous than MAFT classification indicated, i.e., they had AFMA hazard potentials comparable to fabrics with low MAFT heat values.

Multiphoton ionization complements laser-induced fluorescence techniques and now appears to be the best prospect for extending optical diagnostic studies to additional polyatomic molecules.

Keywords: *Fire tests, *Furniture, Heat measurement, Burning rates, Comparison, Flashover, Reprints.

This paper describes a series of room fire tests using upholstered furniture items for comparison with their open burning rates, previously determined in a furniture calorimeter. For the four tests conducted good agreement was seen in all periods of the room fires, including post-flashover, noting that only fuel-controlled room fires were considered. Difficulties in making accurate mass and heat flow measurements in the room's window opening were found, and it is suggested that with present day instrumentation only exhaust stack measurements are reliable. Finally, a number of simplified rules or theories for predicting room flashover based on room physical properties and open-burning heat release values were examined and compared. Broad agreement was generally found, with recommended ones selected on the basis of well controlled asymptotic behavior.

An experimental procedure is described which can be used to derive data relevant to the prediction of ignition and flame spread on materials. The apparatus utilizes a radiant heat source capable of supplying up to 6.5 W/sq cm to a vertically oriented specimen. The test results pertain to piloted ignition of a vertical sample under constant and irradiation, and to lateral flame spread on a vertical surface due to an external applied radiant heat flux. The results can be used to display the maximum velocity and ignition time as a function of irradiance. Critical or minimum irradiances for spread and ignition are determined. An empirical correlation, based on heat conduction principles, is found to correlate the ignition data and also provides a more general interpretation for the flame spread results. Further analyses of the data yield effective values for the thermal inertia of the material (kpc), its ignition temperature, and a parameter related to flame temperature. These parameters appear to be phenomenological constants for each material, rather than factors dependent on the apparatus. Results are presented for a wide range of materials. Suggestions for extending the results to other flame spread conditions are presented.

The burning of more than a single fuel item in a room fire has not been well characterized. The first step in describing multiple item burning is to determine if, in fact, it will occur. This question has been experimentally explored from two aspects. (1) The radiant heat fluxes from burning first-to-ignite objects have been measured, along with their mass loss rates. (2) The ignitability of exposed objects has been determined using a bench-scale uniform flux ignitability test. It is then suggested that whether the second item will ignite can best be determined analytically from considering these two sets of results.

The variation with heat flow geometry of minimum heat source temperature which causes smolder initiation has been examined for eight configurations. These range from a wire-like source, to a flat planar source, to a corner formed by planar sources. They span the geometry range seen by insulation in practice. The ignition temperature for the same insulation varies from 235C (corner source) to 385 degrees (wire source). Other variables such as bulk density or the presence of smolder retardants have much less effect on ignitability. This behavior is predicted in an approximate manner by simple heat generation/heat flow arguments. It is predicted semi-quantitatively by a numerical model using reaction kinetics derived from thermal analysis. The results are used to suggest a smolder ignitability test design and procedure that should correspond closely to the real hazard situation.

Furniture mockups consisting of various arrangements of full-size cushions were tested in the NBS furniture calorimeter. Measurements included heat release, combustion product concentrations, and flame spread characteristics. Major variations in burning were observed: neoprene mockups only smoldered; flame retardant treated polyurethane mockups burned more slowly than untreated mockups but eventually reached similar maximum heat release rates. Fabrics ranked, in terms of maximum heat release rate and several other measured characteristics, from low to high; heavy cotton fabric; light cotton and heavy olefin; and light olefin. Flame spread rate measured on the mockups correlated with time to 100 kW heat release rate. Heat release rate and combustion product concentration generally increased with increasing number of cushions per mockup. Thinner cushions burned more rapidly than thicker ones.

The dynamic equation for an aerosol undergoing simultaneous particle formation and coagulation is solved by the moment method. Solutions are obtained that quantify the evolution of the particle volume distribution function (PVDF) for both a size independent and a free molecular collision function. The solutions show that an equilibrium is rapidly established between the source and the coagulation terms and that the particle number concentration N is then proportional to the square root of the source strength. During the interval of equilibrium there is a widening of the PVDF. These quantities may exceed the asymptotic values that apply in the absence of particle formation.

Laser enhanced ionization (LEI) -- or the optogalvanic effect in flames -- is known to result when a tunable laser is used to significantly populate an excited state of an atomic species in an atmospheric pressure flame. The perturbed ionization rate may be sensed with external electrodes, providing the opportunity for applications to trace metal analysis and combustion research. The present study correlates experimental studies of the spatial and temporal characteristics of the LEI signal with theoretical expectations. The experiments are performed with a cw dye laser exciting the D2 transition of sodium introduced in to H2/air flame. Saturation currents with and without laser excitation are found to be consistent with expected ionization rate constants for the Na ground and excited states. Vertical spatial profiles -- using a unique imaging method -- show the physical size of the excess ion region generated by the laser, and the influence of external voltage, flame velocity, diffusion, and coulombic expansion on the excess ion region. Rise and fall times -- measured at different voltages with the laser switched by an acousto-optic modulator -- show the dependence on ion mobility, electric field, and excited state ionization rate constant. The relationships derived and illustrated would be of value for the improvement of precision and accuracy in analytical and diagnostic LEI.

The parameters measured are rate of heat release, rate of mass loss, heat of gasification, effective heat of combustion, stoichiometric ratio and time to ignite. Heat release rates and mass loss rates are given as a function of time for several external heat flux levels. The rate of heat release is also given as a function of the total heat released. The experimental results and analysis are shown for six diverse materials representative of aircraft (interior panels, carpeting, and seat cushions) and buildings (particle board, polymethyl methacrylate (PMMA) and rigid foam).

In January 1981, a comprehensive survey was undertaken to determine the need for thermophysical properties of the following solid feedstocks/fuels: coal, oil shale, tar sands, gas hydrates. This report deals with that portion of the survey which concerns coal and includes the results of broad consultation with industrial, government, and academic groups as indicated. This survey shows the need for experimental work on heat of combustion, heat capacity/enthalpy, thermal conductivity, and heat of wetting for both well-characterized premium coal samples and for samples of the type which will be used directly in conversion processes. Widely accepted, standardized measurement techniques do not exist for these properties, with the exception of heat of combustion, and must be developed; in addition, reliable data must be generated for efficient use of coal as a feedstock. Theoretical studies which will allow for modeling of properties should proceed along with the experimental investigations to allow for improvement in prediction of coal properties for process design.

World resources of natural gas in hydrate form are on the order of trillions of cubic meters. Thermophysical property measurements are vital to the determination of the exploitability of this resource. The natural gas hydrates are clathrates; the hydrate lattice exists in one of two special structures (I and II), both of which are different from any of the known forms of ice. The hydrate lattice forms with cavities or cages in which molecules in specific size ranges can be trapped. Heat capacities as a function of temperature and, where appropriate, heats of dissociation have been measured for tetrahydrofuran (II), ethylene oxide (I), and cyclopropane (I and II) hydrates by differential scanning calorimetry. The heat capacities were found to vary both with structure and with guest. Scanning calorimetric techniques and sample handling techniques suitable for dealing with hydrates in the subambient region were developed.

A study has been made at the National Bureau of Standards to establish the limits of reliability of the calorific value of municipal solid waste (MSW) by the bomb calorimetric procedure currently used in commercial test laboratories. This procedure involves using gram-size samples derived from MSW that has been processed down to a particle size of 2 mm or less. Critics of the procedure argue that gram-size samples are too small to be representative of such a heterogeneous material, and that processing MSW alters its composition. To test the bomb calorimetric procedure, a 2.5 kg capacity combustion flow calorimeter was designed and constructed for the determination of the enthalpies of combustion of kilogram-size samples of MSW in flowing oxygen near atmospheric pressure.

This report summarizes the results of a project concerning the densities of liquefied natural gas (LNG) and its components. This project, initiated in the Properties of Fluids Section of the Cryogenics Division of the National Bureau of Standards in July 1972, was carried out under the sponsorship of a consortium of eighteen energy companies. The density data have been used to optimize, test, and compare several mathematical models as to their suitability for the calculation of LNG densities for custody transfer. Models selected for optimization and testing included an extended corresponding states method, a hard sphere model, a cell model, and an empirical model due to Klosek and McKinley. The ultimate goal of this project was to produce one or more mathematical models that could be used to predict the density of any LNG mixture to within an uncertainty of 0.1 percent from an input of pressure, temperature, and composition. After revisions based on the new experimental data from this project, each of the models investigated here satisfy this goal for typical LNG compositions. The limitations and ranges of validity of the various models are discussed. Also presented are techniques for predicting LNG densities from dielectric constant measurements and from excess volume calculations. The last section of this report consists of publications that provide a complete and detailed account of the results of this project.

Measurement Techniques for Fuel Stability Characterization.
Final rept.,

tillation, Chromatographic analysis, Reprints, Liquid chromatography, Differential scanning calorimetry.

A measurement technique has been developed to characterize the oxidation stability of liquid fuels under various conditions. The technique is based on high pressure differential scanning calorimetry. It is shown to be sensitive to the chemical compositions of some fuels, including shale-derived jet fuel and a marine diesel fuel. These fuels were subsequently fractionated according to molecular type using liquid chromatography. Using the procedure developed, the oxidation characterizations of the fuel fractions were examined. Results suggested that different amount of various molecular types present in different fuels may affect the overall stability of the fuels. Comparison of results from these tests with the results from commonly used stability tests (JFTOT and accelerated stability) suggests qualitative agreement. The technique offers many advantages in terms of precision, sample size requirement, as well as number of parameters measured.

Semi-Quantitative Ion Microprobe Mass Analysis (IMMA) of Mineral-Rich Particles in the Upper Freeport Coal.

Final rept.,

R. B. Finkelman, F. T. Dulong, R. W. Stanton, D. S. Simons, and E. B. Steel. 1984, 11p

Sponsored in part by Geological Survey, Reston, VA. Pub. in International Jnl. of Coal Geology 3, p279-289 1984.

Keywords: *Coal, *Chemical analysis, *Clay minerals, Trace elements, Electron microscope, Sampling, Reprints, *Ion microprobe mass analyzers.

An ion microprobe mass analyzer has been used to quantitatively analyze clay-rich particles from two facies in the Upper Freeport coal bed. Accuracy is estimated to be \pm or - 20 percent (one standard deviation) for those elements with abundances above 0.1 weight percent and \pm or - 50 percent (one standard deviation) for the remaining elements. Statistically significant differences between the two samples were found for six of the 25 elements detected. For some of these elements (Fe, Li, Mn), the differences seen in the clay-rich particles are similar to the differences found in whole-coal analyses. In other cases differences between the two samples are attributable to irregular distributions of an inorganic phase (Ce, La) or different modes of occurrence of an element (Ca). Differences between the clay-rich phases and bulk analysis are significant for only five elements (Fe, Ca, Na, Ti, K) and are attributable to irregular distributions and/or different modes of occurrence. The authors conclude that quantitative ion microprobe analysis can provide insight into the distribution and mode of occurrence of many trace elements in coal.

Nuclear Magnetic Resonance Studies of Ancient Buried Wood 1. Observations on the Origin of Coal to the Brown Coal Stage.

Final rept.,

P. G. Hatcher, I. A. Breger, and W. L. Earl. 1981, 7p. Pub. in Organic Geochemistry 3, n1-2 p49-55 Jan-Apr 81.

Keywords: *Nuclear magnetic resonance, *Wood, *Anaerobic processes, *Geochemistry, Sediments, Reprints, *Coalification.

Various wood fragments buried in sediments under anaerobic conditions for 450 years to approximately 8 million years have been examined by solid-state nuclear magnetic resonance. Cellulose and other carbohydrates, the major components of Holocene wood, have been shown to be gradually hydrolyzed under the conditions of burial. Lignin structures, however, are preserved relatively unchanged and become concentrated by differences as the carbohydrates disappear. Thus, a fragment of coalified wood isolated from a Miocene brown coal was found to be still composed of approximately 75% lignin and 25% cellulose. On the basis of our observations, we suggest that coalification of woody tissue progresses directly from lignin to coal and that such coalification may not occur until most of the cellulose disappears.

Ignition of a Liquid Fuel Under High Intensity Radiation.

Final rept.,

T. Kashiwagi. 1980, 9p

Pub. in Combustion Science and Technology 21, n3-4 p131-139 1980.

Keywords: *Fuels, *Ignition, Reprints.

This describes an experimental study of the key process of the ignition. First, the effect of the container size on ignition was studied to determine the appropriate container size to avoid wall effects. Then, high speed photographs were taken to observe the events through the preheating period to ignition. Finally the effect on ignition of the incident angle of the laser beam with respect to the liquid surface was studied. Results obtained from these experiments are described.

PB84-155829 401,160

BURNING RATE

Will the Second Item Ignite.
PB85-140432 401,851

BUTANE

Orthobaric Liquid Densities and Dielectric Constants of (Methane + 2-Methylpropane) and (Methane + n-Butane) at Low Temperatures.
PB84-225689 400,251

BUTANE/METHYL

Thermodynamic Properties of Isobutane-Isopentane Mixtures from 240 to 600K and up to 20 MPa (with Supplemental Tables from -40 to + 600F and up to 1000 psia).
PB85-154581 400,638

BUTANES

Measurements of Densities and Dielectric Constants of Liquid Isobutane from 120 to 300 K at Pressures to 35 MPa.
PB84-225697 400,252

Thermodynamic Properties of Isobutane in the Critical Region.
PB84-244730 400,323

Apparatus for Moderate Temperature VLE Measurements of CO₂-Isobutane Systems.
PB85-142115 401,438

Thermodynamic Properties of Isobutane-Isopentane Mixtures from 240 to 600K and up to 20 MPa (with Supplemental Tables from -40 to + 600F and up to 1000 psia).
PB85-154581 400,638

BUTENE

Protonation of C₃H₆ and C₄H₈ Isomers: Isotope Exchange and Isomerization.
PB85-100170 400,349

Isomerization of Carbonium Ions in Collision Complexes.
PB85-124410 400,445

BUTYL RUBBER

Response of Carbon Black Filled Butyl Rubber to Cyclic Loading.
PB85-104867 401,006

BUTYNE

1-Butyne Microwave Spectrum, Barrier to Internal Rotation, and Molecular Dipole Moment.
PB84-219450 400,179

BY DRACONIS STAR

IUE Observations of BY Draconis.
PB85-143378 400,032

CALCIUM PHOSPHATES

Roles of Octacalcium Phosphate in Surface Chemistry of Apatites.
PB84-219054 400,178

Approach to Remineralization via Saliva.
PB84-239318 400,103

Chemical Stability of Carbonate- and Fluoride-Containing Apatites.
PB84-239367 400,297

PB84-217876 401,264

Long Wave Infrared Testing at NBS (National Bureau of Standards).
PB84-223270 401,633

Calibration of AC Susceptometer for Cylindrical Specimens.

PB84-223809 401,295

Source of E and H Fields for Antenna Factor Calibration (A Loop Cell).
PB84-223817 400,811

Calibration Facility for Static Pressure Transducers and Differential Pressure Transducers at High Base Pressure.
PB84-225275 401,302

Millimeter Wave Standards at the National Bureau of Standards (NBS).
PB84-225515 401,304

Simplified System for Calibration of Coupling Capacitor Voltage Transformers.
PB84-226174 401,309

Reference Waveform Flat Pulse Generator.
PB84-227057 401,318

Procedural Standards for Radioactivity Measurements.
PB84-227446 401,510

Calibration System for Producing Known Concentrations of Mercury Vapor in Air.
PB85-104743 401,349

NBS (National Bureau of Standards) 45 Deg/Normal Reflectometer for Absolute Reflectance Factors.
PB85-111847 401,356

Journal of Research of the National Bureau of Standards, Volume 89, Number 2, March-April 1984.
PB85-115426 401,583

Inverse-Fourth Apparatus for Photometric Calibrations.

PB85-136786 401,418

25-Gram-Capacity Oxygen Bomb Calorimeter.
PB85-140325 401,423

Water-Cooled 2 kW Calorimeter for Laser Power Measurement.
PB85-143667 401,622

Calorimeter for Measuring High-Energy Optical Pulses.
PB85-160695 401,478

CALORIMETRY

Current Status of NBS (National Bureau of Standards) Low-Power Laser Energy Measurement.
PB85-115509 401,610

Pulse Calorimetry.
PB85-145522 401,469

CAMAC SYSTEM

Modified CAMAC System for High Speed Burst Data Acquisition.
PB85-128932 400,765

CAPACITORS

Transportable 1000 pF Standard for the NBS (National Bureau of Standards) Capacitance Measurement Assurance Program.
PB84-216902 400,668

CAPILLARY FLOW

Capillary Rise, Wetting Layers, and Critical Phenomena in Confined Geometry.
PB84-219807 400,180

CARBIDES

Abrasive Wear Studies of Laser Surface-Melted Aluminum and Titanium Alloys with Carbide Additions.
PB84-225267 400,920

CARBON

Atomic Transition Probability Measurements for Spectral Lines of the 3S-4P Transition Array of Neutral Carbon.
PB84-244755 400,324

Isotope Shifts of C I Spectral Lines and Their Application to Radioactive Dating by Laser-Assisted Mass Spectrometry.

PB85-118404 401,787

Novel Variable-Temperature Chuck for Use in the Detection of Deep Levels in Processed Semiconductor Wafers.
PB85-123354 400,695

Semiconductor Equipment and Materials Institute Specification for Solar Cell Silicon.
PB85-129435 400,842

Work Related to the Determination of the Avogadro Constant in the PTB (Physikalisch-Technische Bundesanstalt),
PB85-130656 401,567

Absolute Determination of the (220)-Lattice Spacing in Silicon,
PB85-130664 401,568

Systematic Uncertainties in the Determination of the Lattice Spacing d(220) in Silicon,

PB85-130672 401,569

Direct Measurement of the 3 triplet P(sub 0)-3 triplet P(sub 1) Fine-Structure Interval and the g(sub j)-Factor of Atomic Silicon by Laser Magnetic Resonance.
PB85-142073 400,554

SILICON DIOXIDE

Microstructure of Dielectric Thin Films Formed by E-Beam Coevaporation.
PB84-218866 401,547

Blister Test for Adhesion of Polymer Films to SiO2.
PB85-107340 401,021

SILICON NITRIDES

Structural Reliability of Yttria-Doped Hot-Pressed Silicon Nitride at Elevated Temperatures.
PB84-222686 400,851

Creep Cavitation and Crack Growth in Silicon Nitride.
PB85-124311 400,867

PB84-221969 401,107

Deformation and Failure in Large-Scale Pullout Tests.
PB84-221977 401,108

Automated Differential Fiber Strain Measurement System for Single and Multimode Fiber.
PB85-114882 401,660

STRAIN TESTS

Determining Stress and Strain and Texture Using Ultrasonic Velocity Measurements.
PB85-104727 401,347

Experiments on the Small Strain Behavior of Crosslinked Natural Rubber. 1. Torsion.
PB85-104750 401,027

STRAINS

Accurate Determination of Optical Fibre Length from Measurements in the Frequency Domain.
PB85-114932 401,359

STRESS ANALYSIS

Automated Real-Time Analysis of Crack Growth Rates of Steels Tested in a Severe H₂S Environment.
PB84-246040 400,943

Determining Stress and Strain and Texture Using Ultrasonic Velocity Measurements.
PB85-104727 401,347

Relaxation of Stresses in Grazes at Crack Tips and Rate of Craze Extension.
PB85-135416 400,494

Ultrasonic Shear Wave Measurements of Known Residual Stress in Aluminum.
PB85-140002 400,958

STRESSES

Actual Versus Predicted Stresses during Particle Erosion: Observations on Dislocation Cells as a Tool for the Study of Sub-Surface Stresses Accompanying Erosion and Wear Damage.
PB84-224013 400,915

New Technique for the Measurement of Axial-Stress in Optical-Fibre Preforms.
PB85-114841 401,658

Surface-Residual-Stress Evaluation Using Horizontally Polarized Shear Waves.
PB85-142412 401,801

STRUCTURAL ANALYSIS

NBS (National Bureau of Standards) Tri-Directional Test Facility.
PB84-217462 401,261

Implementation of Compressible Shoring Analysis for Multistory Concrete Construction.
PB85-159960 401,246

STRUCTURAL DESIGN

Technical Publications Program

Periodical

Journal of Research—The Journal of Research of the National Bureau of Standards reports NBS research and development in those disciplines of the physical and engineering sciences in which the Bureau is active. These include physics, chemistry, engineering, mathematics, and computer sciences. Papers cover a broad range of subjects, with major emphasis on measurement methodology and the basic technology underlying standardization. Also included from time to time are survey articles on topics closely related to the Bureau's technical and scientific programs. Issued six times a year.

Nonperiodicals

Monographs—Major contributions to the technical literature on various subjects related to the Bureau's scientific and technical activities.

Handbooks—Recommended codes of engineering and industrial practice (including safety codes) developed in cooperation with interested industries, professional organizations, and regulatory bodies.

Special Publications—Include proceedings of conferences sponsored by NBS, NBS annual reports, and other special publications appropriate to this grouping such as wall charts, pocket cards, and bibliographies.

Applied Mathematics Series—Mathematical tables, manuals, and studies of special interest to physicists, engineers, chemists, biologists, mathematicians, computer programmers, and others engaged in scientific and technical work.

National Standard Reference Data Series—Provides quantitative data on the physical and chemical properties of materials, compiled from the world's literature and critically evaluated. Developed under a worldwide program coordinated by NBS under the authority of the National Standard Data Act (Public Law 90-396). NOTE: The Journal of Physical and Chemical Reference Data (JPCRD) is published quarterly for NBS by the American Chemical Society (ACS) and the American Institute of Physics (AIP). Subscriptions, reprints and supplements are available from ACS, 1155 Sixteenth St., NW, Washington, DC 20056.

Building Science Series—Disseminates technical information developed at the Bureau on building materials, components, systems, and whole structures. The series presents research results, test methods, and performance criteria related to the structural and environmental functions and the durability and safety characteristics of building elements and systems.

Technical Notes—Studies or reports which are complete in themselves but restrictive in their treatment of a subject. Analogous to monographs but not so comprehensive in scope or definitive in treatment of the subject area. Often serve as a vehicle for final reports of work performed at NBS under the sponsorship of other government agencies.

Voluntary Product Standards—Developed under procedures published by the Department of Commerce in Part 10, Title 15, of the Code of Federal Regulations. The standards establish nationally recognized requirements for products, and provide all concerned interests with a basis for common understanding of the characteristics of the products. NBS administers this program as a supplement to the activities of the private sector standardizing organizations.

Consumer Information Series—Practical information, based on NBS research and experience, covering areas of interest to the consumer. Easily understandable language and illustrations provide useful background knowledge for shopping in today's technological marketplace.

Order the above NBS publications from: Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, DC 20402.

Order the following NBS publications—FIPS and NBSIR's—from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, VA 22161.

Federal Information Processing Standards Publications (FIPS PUB)—Publications in this series collectively constitute the Federal Information Processing Standards Register. The Register serves as the official source of information in the Federal Government regarding standards issued by NBS pursuant to the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 as amended, Public Law 89-306 (79 Stat. 1127), and as implemented by Executive Order 11717 (38 FR 12315, dated May 11, 1973) and Part 6 of Title 15 CFR (Code of Federal Regulations).

NBS Interagency Reports (NBSIR)—A special series of interim or final reports on work performed by NBS for outside sponsors (both government and non-government). In general, initial distribution is handled by the sponsor; public distribution is by the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, VA 22161, in paper copy or microfiche form.
